Current Research and Work In Progress

Current research interests: epistemology of belief formation and religious faith; Aristotle and contemporary research on animal cognition; philosophical anthropology, especially points of contact between Aristotelian hylomorphism and Kierkegaard's view of the self as a "synthesis"; argumentation in narrative fiction, both literary and cinematic; the self-reference problem for reductive naturalism (and its historical development); science-religion conflict and integration

Aristotle in Narnia: Character and Virtue in C. S. Lewis' Chronicles of Narnia: exploration of Lewis' illustration of character and moral education in his children's fantasy series; several chapters are drafted, and the overall project outlined

Film Apologetics: an analysis of the use of film for apologetic purposes, including sections on religious themes in film, films as natural theology and natural atheology, and classic and contemporary biblical epics; I have made public presentation on several of these

The Craft of Thinking: An Introduction to Philosophical Reasoning, self-authored textbook in use since Spring 1992 and revised annually
